Introduction

"To the media, we offer this challenge:
convex lenses must become concave."
—Rev. Jesse Jackson(1)

Boston, Massachusetts, the birthplace of liberty, has a profoundly troubled history of race relations. Open hostility to blacks, as evidenced by Ku Klux Klan-style cross burnings and episodes of white-on-black violence, is part of the city's legacy. For many black residents, the vigorous and sometimes bloody opposition to court-ordered school integration that marked the 1970s only punctuated a longstanding pattern of discrimination that surfaces in myriad forms throughout the city. A 1985 report by the University of Massachusetts' Institute for the Study of Black Culture documented deeply entrenched inequities in housing, education, and employment for blacks—inequities that, in the words of MIT city planner Dr. Philip L. Clay, have placed black Bostonians "on the downside of a slippery slope."(2) As one local black woman explained to the Boston Globe, "People think this is the South Africa of America."(3)

In their efforts to report on the forces that affect Boston's racial climate, the local media have typically focused on the more obvious institutional actors: businesses, city hall, school boards, churches, the courts, neighborhood groups. Rarely have the media themselves been subjected to the same scrutiny. This study represents one such effort. It is an analysis of the images of Boston's black community that are conveyed through the local news media. It asks the question: If a Bostonian relied solely on the local news for information about local blacks, 1) what impressions would he or she be left with, and 2) how representative of reality might those impressions be?

Given Boston's housing patterns, the question is far from academic. Much of the city is made up of tightly segregated neighborhoods, places where white residents might have little or no meaningful contact with blacks. Similarly, Boston's suburbs have failed to follow a national pattern of modest gains in black residents. People who do not interact with blacks would seem particularly vulnerable to media images whose accuracy they can neither verify nor reject on the basis of their personal experience. And yet all of us, no matter where we live, tend to internalize the messages we receive through the media. To the extent that those messages contradict racist attitudes about blacks or reinforce them, the local media stand as agents for positive social change or unwitting perpetuators of racism.

To better understand how the local media portray Boston's black community, I monitored news reports from a sample of newspapers and radio and television stations for one month during the summer of 1986. I noted the roles blacks played, the activities blacks were shown to be engaged in, and the events that brought blacks into the news. By comparing the portrayal of blacks in Boston's major media with portrayals in the black media, I sought to understand the criteria that reporters and editors use to judge the newsworthiness of items relating to the black community, and to understand whether (and if so, why) the images broadcast about blacks may be unrepresentative.

This report is in five sections. The following section gives background information on racism and the media. It constructs a framework for considering the racial dimensions of local news coverage. The three remaining sections explain how the study was designed, present the findings, and offer conclusions.

Background

During the summer of 1981, TV Guide magazine offered a rare glimpse into the plight of black network news reporters.(4) The magazine surveyed such luminaries as ABC anchor Max Robinson, CBS correspondent Ed Bradley, and PBS reporter Charlayne Hunter-Gault for their views on the networks' sensitivity to racial issues. The consensus was that the networks were guilty of unconscious racism—the notion, instinctively held but never verbalized (and if suggested, vigorously denied)—that blacks are inferior to whites. According to these reporters, unconscious racism was stifling the participation of blacks in network affairs. As a result, blacks felt considerable personal frustration at what they viewed as second-class treatment at the hands of white network executives. They also identified instances in which the networks' insensitivity to racial matters resulted in sins of omission and commission—either important stories about blacks that received no coverage, or stories that won coverage only to misrepresent blacks.

The personal disenchantment that these news veterans voiced came from years of being reminded that their talents were less valuable than those of their white colleagues. Reporters spoke of being excluded from the upper ranks of network management, where key decisions to cover stories are made. They spoke of being persistently denied a presence on the prestigious Sunday morning public-affairs programs, presumably out of the conviction that black reporters would have little to add to the discussion. And they resurrected painful memories of being stereotyped by their own colleagues, as when black students invited to CBS executive Fred Friendly's back yard for an informal broadcasting seminar were served fried chicken and watermelon. While Friendly's menu may have been merely intended to help the students feel welcome, it undoubtedly prompted them to wonder how many other stereotypes about black people the CBS executives were laboring under. In short, the black presence at the networks has not translated into black influence. As Randy Daniels of CBS put it, "We're on the team, but we're not playing."(5)

As frustrating as incidents such as these are for the lives and careers of black reporters, they reflect only half the picture. According to these reporters, racism at the networks is also reflected in the stories that air about blacks, the stories that never air, and the images of blacks that do and do not appear on the screen. Reporters complained about the network perception that blacks should be restricted to covering "black" stories—civil rights, housing, welfare. In Washington, D.C., the running joke among black reporters is that rather than making lunch dates to see all your friends, you need only await the next press conference at the Dept. of Housing and Urban Development. Like many black reporters, Randy Daniels is sensitive to the mental images that viewers make between certain issues and black Americans. Commenting on a recent story he produced about food stamps, Daniels said, "For me to go out and find some black lady reinforces an image that I'm opposed to. There are other people on welfare."(6) Of course, even if all stories about so-called minority issues featured white faces, the fact that the stories were being produced by black reporters might lead a viewer to reason that blacks do not have the expertise to talk about anything else.

A second problem that gained frequent mention was the bona fide news story about blacks that failed to make it on the air. Paul Good, author of The Trouble I've Seen: White Journalist/Black Movement, found in a random check of 16 months of network news during 1975 and 1976 "a consistent failure to cover minority stories."(7) A report in The New York Times, for example, revealed that plans to increase minority hiring had been approved at only 31 of 1300 eligible colleges nationwide—this at a time when affirmative action programs were being widely denounced as being unfair to whites. Another report chronicled an impossible logjam of 125,000 discrimination cases at the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The report emerged the day after MIT economist Lester Thurow warned that despite the appearance of progress, "Nothing has changed in the past thirty years to narrow the income gap between blacks and whites." These were two of the dozens of minority-oriented stories of national importance that failed to appear on network news.(8) Former Federal Communications Commissioner Benjamin Hooks agrees that the networks pay scant attention to minority news. "The complaints to me are incessant from blacks and Hispanics, that news content in relation to them is practically nil. My own personal impression—and this isn't scientific—is that the networks don't make any conscientious effort at minority coverage."(9)

Finally, critics say the minority stories that the networks do cover tend to reinforce negative stereotypes about blacks. Tony Batten, now a producer for 60 Minutes, remembers how he approached the executive producer of WNET-TV news in New York City to suggest a feature on the behind-the-scenes preparations for "Bubbling Brown Sugar." At the time, the play about life in Harlem was rumored to be Broadway's next hit. The producer was disappointed by the dress rehearsal he sat through—it had no book, no score, no lyrics worth remembering—but told Batten that the play had given him another idea: a news feature on the drug trade in Harlem.(10) "Bubbling Brown Sugar" had nothing to do with drugs, but the play had tapped into what the producer knew about blacks—that blacks are drug abusers. The anecdote illustrates the common complaint among black reporters that news executives often select stories that fit white perceptions of who black people are—perceptions that may not be accurate. PBS reporter Charlayne Hunter-Gault says the networks have a history of covering blacks only in moments of crisis. "There are about as many nice, ordinary, everyday human-interest stories about black people on television as there are black brides on The New York Times society page."(11) Indeed, one survey found that although blacks appeared in nearly 25% of network television news reports in the early 1970s, they were mostly in non-speaking roles in stories related to busing, desegregation, and other civil rights issues.(12)

Many observers agree that the single largest reason for the networks' poor coverage of racial news is related to the racial makeup of the networks' own staffs. Until the mid-1960s, there was but a handful of black faces at the networks. By the early 1970s, a national sensitivity to civil rights that was bringing change to other institutions had affected the networks as well. For black reporters, it was a time of easier hires and even active recruitment. But the door never opened very wide. By the time the hiring enthusiasm chilled in the mid-1970s, blacks comprised only 3% of the network news correspondents, according to a Federal Communications Commission survey.(13)

If the percentage of blacks in the newsroom does not reflect their presence in the real world, the executive suites are even whiter. Blacks currently account for 12% of the U.S. population. But according to Operation PUSH, the Chicago-based black-empowerment group, only 5% of the 9,700 top officers and managers of the three major news networks are black. Operation PUSH has called for a black boycott of CBS, citing the network's particularly poor hiring record for minorities and inattention to black-oriented news. At CBS's annual meeting in April, PUSH National President Rev. Jesse Jackson offered the following statistics to station executives: "Today, there are zero black or Hispanic station managers at CBS. Zero black or Hispanic news directors. Zero black or Hispanic program directors. Zero black or Hispanic executive producers." Jackson continued, "Three wars [are] being waged on the continent right now: Libya, Angola, and South Africa. More than one-eighth of the human race, more than thirty million Americans are of African heritage. Yet CBS has no news bureaus between the Sahara and the Cape of Good Hope."(14)

The hiring record of the print media is comparable. In 1967, before the rush to hire minority newspaper journalists, fewer than 5% of the editorial staffs in the news business were black. For editors and supervisors, the figure was less than 1%, and most of them worked for black-owned organizations.(15) In 1985, the number of minority newspaper journalists in the United States stood at 5.7%. That figure represented a slight decline from the year before, despite a stated goal of newspaper editors to integrate newsrooms by the year 2000.(16) It is clear that, despite incremental gains, the magnitude of minority participation in the newspaper business has not changed significantly in the past twenty years.

The racial composition of the people who bring us the news is crucial to understanding the images of blacks that the news projects. While many of the rules of the news business are clear-cut and easy to articulate—codes of ethics for journalists, for example—the rules that govern the selection and presentation of news are much more subjective. Interviews with reporters and editors have consistently shown that the often-mentioned commodity known as "news sense" is amorphous. "We are not talking about a science or a technique," concluded one study on television news reporting. "[I]t is really an art which is at the fingertips of the practitioner. It depends on many thousands of personal judgements, moods, and feelings."(17) Much of what a fledgling reporter learns about developing a sense of what is or is not newsworthy is picked up unconsciously from newsroom veterans. In time, says Harold Evans, editorial director for U.S. News and World Report, "so many of the judgements become so routine that we forget we are making them."(18)

Because the decision of what is news involves subjective and often subconscious judgement, the depiction of blacks can be defined by the expectations of white news managers. Analyses of reports of race-related news in the United States and Britain suggest not only a tendency for news professionals to place events within a framework of familiar images and stereotypes, but the even more disturbing practice of judging the newsworthiness of a story depending on whether it fits those expectations. In Racism and the Mass Media, mass communications experts Paul Hartmann and Charles Husband suggest that current events that conform to a reporter's preconceived notions stand a better chance of making the news than those that challenge those notions, and that subsequent events may be interpreted in terms of existing images even when those images are no longer appropriate.(19) Thus, while a Broadway play about Harlem's artistic heritage was an illogical inspiration for a news story about drugs, the news producer who made the suggestion was fitting the play into a set of prevailing images about blacks—even as he sat and witnessed evidence that the images were inappropriate.

Hartmann and Husband go on to explain that what is newsworthy to reporters is inexorably coupled with what is newsworthy to their audience. "Given the situation in the United States, where the major news media are staffed by white personnel and serve a mainly white audience, it follows that the 'public' which dictates newsworthy events is a white public."(20) Indeed, as far back as 1967, when President Johnson convened a national advisory commission to investigate the role that the news media played in the racial disturbances of the 1960s, the group found that despite real efforts to present factual accounts, the media's portrayal of violence was exaggerated, and there was a consistent failure to report on the underlying causes of racial problems. One reason was the racial makeup of the media, which presented the news from a white perspective: "The world that television and newspapers offer to their black audience is almost totally white, in both appearance and attitude."(21)

Hartmann and Husband offer another reason for the media's inattention to the root causes of racial problems. They argue that the condition of blacks is not a primary concern of whites until blacks threaten the status quo. Boycotts, demonstrations, teen pregnancy, violent crime—these issues all cross thresholds of newsworthiness for the white media, despite that they are but manifestations of deeply rooted conditions for blacks—conditions that the media rarely explore—and that when such news reports emerge as the sole portrayals of black Americans, the audience receives little impression of the richness and diversity of the black com-

To understand how the media project distorted images of blacks, it is not necessary to invoke the racism of individual reporters. The very forces that underlie news production constitute a built-in tendency to present news that reinforces stereotypes and discourages serious discussion of racial issues.(23) One obstacle to balanced reporting is the tendency of the media to focus on negative stories, which means that news of racial harmony is less likely to be covered than racial violence. It also means that black achievement is less likely to be covered than black failure.(24)

Another impediment is the media's attraction to stories that are easy to cover. Stories with action and excitement, those that involve easily recognized key figures, and those with straightforward plots stand a greater chance of being covered than less dramatic stories of subtlety and complexity. For example, here is how CBS vice-president William Small rebuts the charge that the network's failure to cover black issues reflects racism: "This operation does not have a built-in bias nor could it. Still it's obvious that the civil rights movement as such is not the story it once was. [Emphasis added] In the sixties, you had the charisma of the leadership, the force of the personalities of men like Dr. King. There are very few of those today [1977]."(25) Small's response suggests that in the eyes of the media, the newsworthiness of a story is directly related to how easy it is to report. This can work against an issue such as modern-day racism, which has become more subtle and complex since the 1960s, but is no less important today.

Racial issues do not always satisfy the media's criteria for the ideal news story, all neat and packaged, but that does not mean that the issues are unworthy of coverage. When news executives such as Mr. Small do not realize that their news decisions are inexorably guided by their own color—as is true for people of all races—the dangers of presenting the news from a single perspective become clear. Thus the need to open the ranks of the media's decision making positions to representative numbers of minorities. As Rev. Jesse Jackson puts it, "Since the media cannot attain absolute objectivity, it must press for fairness."(26)

This issue of fairness is the overriding reason for this study. As the news media flash images of Boston's residents, is the city's black community represented fairly? To what extent does local news suffer from the same problems that hinder fair coverage of black issues at the national television networks—typecasting of black reporters, neglect of black-related news, reinforcement of negative stereotypes about blacks? To answer these questions, a sample of local news reports was taken to form a representative collection of images of the black community as seen through the eyes of the media. The design of the study is outlined in the following section.

Study design

This study used a sample of local news reports to obtain a representative collection of images of Boston's black community. The major features of the study are outlined below.

News outlets

Of the dozens of media outlets in the metropolitan Boston area, eleven were selected for the study: five newspapers, three television stations, and three radio stations. Without explanation, one of the radio stations later declined after initially agreeing to participate, bringing the total to ten. Six of these are major media outlets:

Newspaper	Television	Radio
Boston Globe (daily)	WGBH (10:00 pm)	WBCN-FM
Boston Herald (daily)	WBZ (6:00 pm)	(5:57-9:00 am)
	WCVB (11:00 pm)

These outlets were selected primarily on the basis of their size. The Boston Globe and the Boston Herald are New England's first and second largest selling newspapers, with daily circulations of 514,000 and 355,000, respectively.(27) WBZ and WCVB were ranked first and second in commercial television ratings for 1985, with average daily audiences of 1,209,000 and 1,129,000, respectively.(28) Public broadcasting station WGBH rates fourth among UHF stations in New England, with a daily audience of 40,000.(29) WBCN-FM, a 50,000-watt, contemporary format station, was the second most popular radio station during the study period, according to Arbitron ratings.(30)

Four media outlets in Boston are owned and operated largely by blacks:

Newspaper	Radio
Bay State Banner (weekly)	WILD-AM
Boston Greater News (weekly)	(5:50-11:20 am)
Roxbury Community News (monthly)

The newspapers have a combined circulation in excess of 20,000; the radio station ranks fifteenth in the Boston market, broadcasting to an estimated 24,000 daily listeners.(31) These four outlets are primary sources of information about the city's black community.

The staffs of the black media outlets are virtually 100% black. At the major media outlets, the number of black employees varies. The best available estimates indicate that these six media outlets employ 69 blacks on news staffs that total 699 employees, for an overall black presence of 9.9% (Table 1).

The 8.0% average for blacks at the two newspapers is above the current national average of 5.7%.(32) Likewise, the 15.1% average for the four broadcast stations is higher than the current national average of 8.7%.(33) None of the local figures, either individually or in combination, reflect black employees in numbers representative of the 22% black population of Boston proper (34), though several approximate or exceed the 15.6% black population of the larger metropolitan area from which the news was drawn.*(35)

Scope of News

The study encompasses news reports for the period June 9, 1986, to July 9, 1986. Because some news outlets do not operate on weekends, only weekday news reports were included. The beginning and ending dates were selected arbitrarily.

Local media offer regional, national, and international news as well as news from the immediate locality. For the purposes of this study, local news was defined as news that: 1) took place in the city of Boston or within a thirty-mile radius of the city, or 2) involved local people or institutions, regardless of where the actual event took place.

The first criterion allowed for the inclusion of local reaction to regional, national and international news; the second for out-of-town deaths of area residents, results of out-of-town sports contests involving local teams, and actions of Massachusetts' elected officials in Washington, D.C.

Following these criteria, a portion of every newspaper and news broadcast was excluded from the study. Among these items were news reports from neighboring states and central and western Massachusetts without a local "hook"; editorials, commentary, and syndicated columns; letters to the editor; general interest stories and special sections (such as science or food) without a local news angle.

Data Collection

Newspapers were home-delivered, scripts of radio newscasts were supplied by the stations; television broadcasts were recorded on a videocassette recorder.

Data Recording

Each local news item was summarized according to the format in Table 2. Codes for the geographic location of a news story and for the category of news it represents are given in Tables 3 and 4.

The same item appearing in two different media outlets was treated as two separate stories; news stories repeated within the same outlet (as with a radio station's repetition of the top news of the day) were counted as one story.

*A Pulitzer Prize-winning series of reports published in the Boston Globe in 1983 revealed widespread discrimination and rampant underutilization of blacks in the workplace. The newspaper included itself in its survey of Boston businesses and industries, and found that working conditions for blacks at the most influential newspaper in New England were not much better than anywhere else in the city. Reporter Jonathan Kaufman wrote, "When the senior editors of the Boston Globe meet at 10:30 every morning to plan the next day's paper—deciding which stories to cover and which are likely to run on page one—nine persons attend. None is black."(37)

At the time, 6.3% of the 331 newsroom positions at the paper were black, twice the national average of 3.1%. Editor Thomas Winship acknowledged that although the paper ranked among the top half dozen newspapers nationwide on minority hires, "that in itself is distressing because our own record is so disappointing."(38) Today, blacks occupy 10% of the newsroom positions at the newspaper, thanks in part to an agreement the Globe signed with a group of black ministers who approached it shortly after the publication of the 1983 article. The paper agreed that one out of every four new part-time and full-time employees would be black. One of those new hires is a national editor who now sits in on the Globe morning planning meetings.(39)

The Boston Herald declined to disclose its employment figures, but a veteran Boston journalist who requested anonymity said the paper employs one black copy editor and one reporter on a news staff of 120. In 1983, the then-current employment figures for the Herald were quoted in the Globe articles on black employment. At the time, there was one black news employee on a staff of 100. The Herald had been recently purchased by Rupert Murdoch. Robert Page, the new publisher, told the Globe : "It's a bad situation, but we inherited it."(40)

‡WCVB-TV declined to furnish information on the number of blacks in its news operation, but said the overall percentage of blacks in the company stands at 13.8%. If this figure is representative of the news department, which numbers approximately 75 employees, it would bring the number of black news employees to 10. Given the disproportionate presence of blacks on office and clerical staffs at many stations, this estimate could be high.

For each news story, the date (DATE) and source (OUTLET) were recorded. Each story was assigned a two-, three-, or four-letter code describing the geographic location of the story (CITY) and the category of news the story represents (TYPE). These codes are given in Tables 3 and 4. The three stories above appeared in the June 9, 1986, edition of the Boston Globe, took place in Boston and Quincy, and involved sports and downtown development.

Each news item was briefly summarized (SUMMARY). The race of the persons in the story was recorded according to whether the item included blacks (B), other minorities (O), whites only (W), or whether the race of the subject(s) was unspecified or otherwise unclear (U). If a story mentioned blacks or other minorities, the context (CONTEXT) of these mentions was recorded. Any additional notes or comments (COMMENTS) to help clarify the news item were also included.

Data Analysis

Information on each local news story was entered into a personal computer (Leading Edge, model DR-1240) and analyzed using a dBASE III computer program. This program allows a user to enter disparate data and to generate lists of all data sharing similar characteristics. The computer program used for this study is given in Appendix A.

Results

Major Media vs. Black Media

Information was collected on a total of 3,215 local news stories.* Of these, 2,125 stories (69%) originated within the city of Boston; the remainder took place in outlying communities or beyond. The major media accounted for 2,898 stories (90%); the black media for 317 (10%). (See Appendices B and C.) The print media accounted for 2,501 stories (81%); the broadcast media for 569 (19%).

Determining the race of people in the news was an inexact science. With television news, race was usually obvious. Only when a television story was accompanied by a reporter's or anchor's voice and a background illustration instead of actual news footage was race not clear. For newspapers and radio, with fewer visual clues, race was more difficult to determine.† People were counted as "black" if they were a well-known local black figure (such as Mel King, candidate for the 8th District Congressional seat, or Jim Rice, a member of the Boston Red Sox baseball team); if they were identified by race in an article; if they were shown in a photograph; or if their names were accompanied by the words "black" or "blacks" (as in "black neighborhood residents"). The same criteria were used for whites. For minorities other than blacks, surnames (such as Martinez, Li, or Nkomo) were used as clues in addition to the above criteria. The racial composition of a geographic area was not considered when deciding the race of the people in news taken from that area.

*Technical problems with the videocassette recorder resulted in the loss of 11 of 69 newscasts in their entirety, as well as occasional brief (5-minute) losses in the closing minutes of a half-hour broadcast. The impact, if any, of these missed segments on the results of the study is not known.

Because many news mentions contained no clue as to race, the numbers for blacks, whites, and minorities other than blacks given below are most certainly underestimations. For example, the actual number of news items that mention blacks includes the figure given under the category "blacks" plus an indeterminable number of mentions classified as "unclear."

In the major media, blacks were mentioned in 477 (16%) of the news stories. Minorities other than blacks were mentioned in 100 (3%) of the news stories. (Hispanics and Asians appeared most frequently.) In 534 stories (18%), no minorities were mentioned. In 1,817 stories (63%), the race of the persons in the news item was unclear. (Because blacks and other minorities were occasionally mentioned in the same news story, the above numbers total 2,928—101% of the news items emerging from the major media.)

In the black media, persons identifiable as black appeared in 112 (35%) of the news stories. Minorities other than blacks were mentioned in 7 (2%) of the news stories. Twenty-four stories (8%) featured all whites. The remaining 174 mentions (54%) were unclear.

There were noticeable similarities in the types of news covered by the major media and the black media. In both cases, news about crime, sports, and city and state government were among the most often mentioned items. Table 5 summarizes the fifteen most frequently appearing news categories for both the major and black media. A complete breakdown of all news categories for both media is given in Table 6.

News from the black media was dominated by WILD-AM radio, which accounted for nearly half (47%) of the news items. WILD relies heavily for news on the Boston Globe, the Boston Herald, and other major outlets.(43) The station is the only black media outlet to engage in this practice.

†The stylebook for the Boston Globe dictates that race be specified "only when it is pertinent or when giving a physical description of an individual" that includes such details as a person's height, weight, a description of clothing, etc.(41) The policy is evident throughout the news stories collected for this study. Race is mentioned in the Globe if it is important to the sense of a story, as with this example from June 13, 1986: "Although there was no charge of racism, Smith, who is black, and other witnesses said that MacIsaac, who is white, had referred to Smith as 'Captain Midnight'." Race is also specified in descriptions of crime suspects wanted by the police. Policies similar to that of the Globe are evident at other media outlets as well. This represents reform from earlier years when the media commonly specified the race of criminals if they were black, but not if they were white.(42)

the major media and the black media. Brief summaries of each story are given in Appendix D. In the major media, 85% (39 of 46) of the news items reinforced negative stereotypes about blacks:

NEWS	STEREOTYPE REINFORCED
Drug seizures and arrests, other drug-related crime (12 stories)	Blacks are drug pushers and users
Teacher arrested for robbery gets pay (6/12/86) Man convicted in funeral home thefts (6/25/86) Armed robber receives sentence (6/26/86)	Blacks are thieves
Residents protest neighborhood trash dumping (6/19/86)	Blacks are dirty
Sears workers strike (6/20/86) Residents sue city over development plans (6/12/86)(4 stories) Roxbury voters decide on secession (6/12/86)(3 stories)	Blacks are troublemakers
Man wanted for assault on girl (6/27/86) Scuffle leads to gunshot wound (6/13/86) Child falls three stories from window (6/23/86)(2 stories) Man shot in family feud (6/16/86) Man who rec'd tax sentence had shot police officer (7/9/86) Teen shot accidentally (6/12/86)(3 stories)	Blacks live violent lives...
Commuter train collision kills woman (6/18/86)(2 stories) Youth dies in scooter crash (7/9/86) Man killed in stabbing (7/2/86) Man slays wife with baseball bat (6/24/86)(2 stories)	...and die violent deaths

Only 22% (10 of 46) of the stories contradicted prevailing assumptions about blacks. (Some stories both reinforced and challenged stereotypes.) The scarcity of news stories that challenge stereotypes of blacks is consistent with the observation by Hartmann and Husband (see pp. 6-7) that news personnel are more likely to report stories that align with their preconceptions of blacks than they are to report stories that challenge those preconceptions.

NEWS	STEREOTYPE CHALLENGED
Residents sue over development plans (6/12/86) (3 stories) Suit charges illegal land disposal (6/12/86)	Blacks don't know how to exercise power
Program aids minority entrepreneurs (7/7/86)	Blacks don't care about getting ahead
Roxbury voters decide on secession (6/12/86) (4 stories) Activist to run for state representative (6/16/86)	Blacks are apathetic

In contrast, a significant number of the news stories reported by the black media challenge negative expectations about blacks. At least 31 of the 66 stories (47%; these stories are marked with asterisks in Appendix D) reveal aspects of the black community that are both positive and rarely portrayed on the major news media: a thirst for educational achievement, eagerness to remedy living conditions poisoned by poverty and bureaucratic neglect, advancement in the worlds of business and finance. When news from WILD radio is excluded, the figures are even higher (27 of 47 news stories, or 57%).

Many of these stories went unreported by the major media. Table 10 gives news from Roxbury and Mattapan that was carried by the black media but not reported by major news outlets.

Tables 9 and 10 suggest that the major media news about Roxbury and Mattapan is biased in the direction of commonly held stereotypes about blacks and about the poor. Stories featuring crime and violence predominate, even in the presence of newsworthy stories that reveal aspects of the black community that defy these stereotypes.

Roxbury and Mattapan appear in only 1% of the news carried by Boston's major media. As a result, these two communities do not dominate any one category of news. But because the news that does emerge from these black enclaves is heavily weighted toward crime and violence—and away from education, entrepreneurship, art, community pride, and other positive concepts—the typical news consumer might easily associate these negative images with inner-city blacks. For example, 93% of the crime reported in the major media occurred outside Roxbury and Mattapan. But 59% of the news from these two neighborhoods concerned crime. The unspoken message is that all criminals may not be black, but most blacks are criminals.

Black Mentions in the Major Media

Table 11 is a numerical profile of the stories in the major media that mentioned blacks. For each category of news, Table 11 shows the total number of stories (Column A); the number and percentage of stories that mentioned blacks (Columns B and C); and the percentage of all major media stories represented by the numbers in Column B. For example, there were 50 stories about accidents. Blacks appeared in 7 of them (14%), which is 0.2% of all the stories that appeared in the major media.

Column C of Table 11 gives an indication of how "black" different categories of news appear to be. This column was rearranged in order of the frequency of black mentions (Table 12). Assuming an overall black population of 15.6% in the communities from which the news was drawn*, eight categories of local news featured a higher percentage of blacks than actually live in the greater Boston area. These categories are profiles of politicians and performers (50.0%), sports (44.9%), education (39.7%), international news (29.1%), interviews (25.0%), entertainment (24.4%), miscellaneous news (18.0%), and media (15.8%).

In some categories, the apparent frequent appearance of blacks was caused by factors that belied the true representation of the local black community. For example, one black man, Boston City School Superintendent Laval Wilson, accounted for 14 of the 35 education stories that mention blacks. Were it not for these mentions, blacks would be featured in only 24% of the education news rather than the present 40%. Similarly, much of the entertainment news featured such nationally known artists as Bill Cosby and Patti Labelle, who performed in and around Boston during the time of this study. If this category were modified to include only local talent, black mentions would fall from 24% to a mere 7%. Finally, crime news was dominated by a celebrated sex abuse case involving a day care center in suburban Boston. (The case involved no blacks.) This case alone accounted for as many crime stories (35) as all those mentioning blacks combined. If such a major news event were excluded from the analysis, the proportion of crime stories involving blacks would rise.

*The 15.6% figure represents a weighted average of the number of black residents in the communities appearing on the local news. Of the 2,898 news stories in the major media, 1,971 or 68% were from a community in the city of Boston, which is approximately 22% black. Most of the remaining 32% of the stories originated in the suburbs, which are 2% black. (68%)x(22%)+(32%)x(2%)=.156 or 15.6%.

Racial Themes in the News

In addition to examining individual categories of news, as in the section above, much can be learned by considering themes that cut across category lines. Scrutinizing the 2,898 news items that emerged from the major media brought insights into such overarching issues as how blacks are portrayed, how whites are portrayed in relation to blacks, and how the media report on news stories that touch on racism. These questions are examined below.

For an overall impression of how Boston's black community is seen through the eyes of the major media, news stories were reviewed for the roles that blacks (including black reporters) played, the activities blacks were shown pursuing, and the events that brought blacks into the news.

In contrast to their network counterparts, black television reporters in Boston covered a wide array of stories, not just those involving civil rights or other traditionally "black" issues. In fact, television news (the only medium for which the race of the reporter was evident) showed black reporters almost exclusively handling non-black stories (business, politics, state and city government, the environment, etc.). This suggests that black reporters in Boston have been able to escape the assumption that their skills are limited to addressing issues associated with their race.

As objects of news reports, blacks in a number of stories were shown in positive roles or engaged in nonstereotypical activities. Black people were shown as possessing special expertise in law (judge, attorney, expert on sexual harrassment, special prosecutor hand-picked by Governor Dukakis); in medicine (physician's assistant, rescuer in auto accident); and in law enforcement (police officer, police recruits). They were shown devoted to solving community problems (neighborhood activists, director of a cocaine addiction center), and aspiring to art (dance students). In a season of successful basketball and baseball teams, the talents of black athletes won consistent praise.

Perhaps even more important, blacks were occasionally shown as ordinary people: lifeguards, airline passengers, school children and teachers. This is significant because most of the blacks featured in major media news stories were celebrities of one sort or another. As Column B of Table 11 indicates, blacks were mentioned most frequently as athletes, entertainers, criminals, and as visible figures in education and politics. These five categories alone accounted for 78% of the news items that mentioned blacks. When an ethnic group is repeatedly portrayed in certain roles and activities, the group seems more homogeneous than it really is. It would be natural for a Bostonian to come away from the news with the impression that most blacks were accomplished athletes, talented entertainers, or dangerous criminals. But pigeonholing blacks in this way denies the diversity of the black community, diversity that lets blacks be seen as individual human beings instead of categories. Offering a balanced view of who black people really are—people—can help erode stereotypes that for both whites and blacks lead to limited expectations of the black community.

Along similar lines, there were at least two news stories that helped dispel the myth that most of the recipients of social welfare programs are black. One article on a local Head Start program was accompanied by a photograph of a white child. Another story on a home for unwed mothers featured exclusively white faces in a suburban community.

However, a substantial number of stories portrayed blacks as drug pushers, thieves, failing students, and people either unable or unwilling to fit into mainstream culture. A June 13 story about a mediation service focused on the case of a landlord trying to get a Roxbury tenant to pay her $100 overdue rent. A June 13 item explained that muggers and rapists had become so prevalent in Dorchester (a working-class community, 30% black and Hispanic) that enforcement, black drug users were shown arrested by white police officers, and a black police officer was shown conferring at the scene of a crime with his superior, a white police superintendent (June 12). In housing, a black tenant gave her view of a public housing controversy; the other three interviewees—a developer, the mayor, and the governor—were white (June 23). In business, black entrepreneurs and workers were shown being counseled by white business consultants (July 4,7). In sports, the local medical experts brought in to explain the sudden death of Leonard Bias, a black basketball player and top draft choice of the Boston Celtics, were all white (June 19).

Occasionally, even issues that were rooted in race had white spokespersons. When the Boston public school system released figures showing how black and Hispanic students were failing disproportionately more than whites, a local television station interviewed white education experts instead of black school superintendent Laval Wilson or one of the four black members of the Boston school committee (June 20). And when the state came under criticism for underestimating statistics on unemployment, an issue whose disproportionate impact on the black community is well known, the newspaper carrying the story limited its coverage to a discussion with the white labor experts whose research suggested the discrepancy (June 9).

All of these portrayals of local black people and the conditions and issues that affect them are real; that is to say, none were invented. In their actions, activities, aspirations, and abilities, some blacks do challenge stereotypical ideas about the black community; others reinforce these notions. Likewise, black Bostonians are severely underrepresented in the city's power positions. The 1985 report, The Emerging Black Community of Boston, documents in rich detail a persistent history of discrimination against blacks in public and private employment, housing, education, and political institutions.(45)

But as much as the news is a depiction of real events, it is just as undeniably a reflection of one view of reality—a view that may not represent a significant portion of Boston residents. By and large, the ways that the major media reported the news during this study period reflected white, upper-middle class values. We have already seen that media portrayals of Boston's black residents often coincided with negative stereotypes, particularly with news from the city's predominantly black neighborhoods. In addition, local news displayed a bias in favor of lifestyles and institutions of the relatively affluent. On June 9, for example, the Boston Globe carried an article about an auction at public television station WGBH, a station with a reputation for attracting a relatively upscale audience. The article reported that one viewer paid $861 for a pair of shoes worn by basketball star Larry Bird; another paid $13,000 for a pair of Celtics season tickets. That same day, the Boston Herald wrote in a concert review that the all-black Modern Jazz Quartet was "the first group in jazz history to bring respectability to the music," a claim based on the preference of "these tuxedoed gentlemen" for formal concert halls. The next day, the Globe ran an article on the rising cost of having a child. Under an illustration of a smiling, pink-skinned baby and a photograph of a white infant surrounded by her wardrobe, the article listed a collection of expensive accessories ranging from layette ($123) and changing table ($75) to diaper service ($1560) and bed ($75 cribs to $2,000 antiques). Many other examples fit this pattern. The Boston Globe in particular tends to feature news of exclusive housing, expensive furnishings, gourmet delicacies, exotic vacations, ambitious investments, and other items priced far beyond the reach of the average Bostonian and many blacks.*

Media coverage of occasional parallel events in the white and black communities also

*One local story supporting the idea that the news is reported from a white, upper-middle class perspective suggests that negative events do not become newsworthy until they are noticeable in the black community, even when they occur simultaneously in the white community. During the last days of June, 1986, two women were admitted to Boston City Hospital with problem pregnancies. The women were in premature labor that had been inadvertently induced by cocaine. On June 30, city and state health officials used the two cases to illustrate the dangers of cocaine use during pregnancy. The announcement was widely reported by the local media, including four of the six major news outlets monitored in this study.

None of the news stories specified the women's race, although one television station illustrated its coverage by interviewing a black woman who admitted to using cocaine while she was pregnant. But since the story originated from a public hospital that primarily serves minorites and the poor, it would have been reasonable for all readers and viewers to come away with the impression that the issue is largely a black problem.

In reality, the problem is much more widespread. The Boston Globe , in a July 2 follow-up article, recognized that many pregnant women use cocaine. The paper quoted the chief of obstetrics and gynecology at the New England Medical Center as confirming, "We see a lot of upper middle class users. It's similar to child abuse where two years ago we assumed the problem was limited to poor people." Stephen Moss, Boston area regional manager for the Massachusetts Division of Alcohol and Drug Rehabilitation, agrees that overall cocaine use "definitely isn't a black issue." Moss says that when whites undergo treatment for cocaine abuse, the police and other authorities are often willing to keep the news quiet out of respect for the abusers and their families. If an abuser is poor or a minority, the chances of coming under public scrutiny are much greater.(46) points to an orientation toward stories that reflect the values of white and/or upwardly mobile Bostonians. For example, a seven-day, $1,400 a head, fundraising cruise for a local charity gained a press mention. Yet no major media outlet saw fit to cover, as the black newspaper Bay State Banner did, a June 7 fundraising cruise around Boston harbor to benefit Boston's black-oriented radio station, WILD. Similarly, when a white college student was found murdered near her home on July 1, the major media ran four stories, including one soliciting the help of the community by giving a police description of the alleged assailant. Three days later, an item in the black newspaper, Boston Greater News, marked the four-year anniversary of the unsolved murder of a sixteen year-old black girl whose body was found in a city park after she disappeared from a street in Roxbury. The article said that the girl had been abducted by white Boston police officers and taken to a police athletic club where she was raped by 6-8 white officers. It went on to cite evidence that a detective pursuing the case has been rebuffed by the present and former police commissioners and the U.S. Attorney's office. Black community leaders who have been pressing for a resolution of the case say that news of the murder and its aftermath has not been widely reported by the major media.(47)

One of the clearest indications of the media's attitudes toward blacks was the reporting that occurred on stories that directly involved racism. Boston's tempestuous resistance to busing is legendary, as is its reluctance to integrated neighborhoods. As for employment, the Boston Globe concluded in 1983 that "Boston is the most difficult city in the United States" for a black person to hold a job or earn a promotion.(48) Given the magnitude of the problem, the media's recognition of racism and of racial themes in the news is an important part of their mission to inform and to educate.

Of the 2,898 news items in the major media, approximately 15 had overt, direct links to themes of racism and race relations. In six cases, the media dealt with the question of racism squarely and thoughtfully:

Two stories concerned Boston's Ivory-Ebony basketball league (June 13) and an interracial suburban group (June 30), both of which were formed by community residents to ease racial tensions.

One story dealt with how winning sports teams serve to break down racial barriers (June 11).

One story featured local responses to the Supreme Court's July 2 ruling in favor of affirmative action programs. The report quoted reactions to the ruling and thoughts about job discrimination from a broad cross-section of Boston attorneys and activists, and went on to feature person-on-the-street interviews with eight Boston residents, two of them black (July 3).

Two stories concerned a U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission ruling in favor of Tommy Harper, a black man and former player and coaching assistant for the Boston Red Sox organization. Harper was fired from the Red Sox shortly after he acknowledged to a reporter the club's practice of distributing free passes to an openly segregated Elks Lodge. The Red Sox, which stopped distributing the passes the day before Harper's statement appeared in the press, said they were firing Harper because he was incompetent, a claim the EEOC found "entirely pretextual." The EEOC also ruled that there was "sufficient evidence" that the Red Sox have created and perpetuated a working environment hostile to minority employees.(49)

In a thorough, lengthy (42 column-inch) article (July 2), the Boston Globe explored both sides of the case and went to both the team's management and minority players for their views on racism within the organization. In a second story, WGBH-TV (July 2) was equally sober in acknowledging the implications of the EEOC ruling. A black reporter began the story with these words: "There are always certain images that come to mind when people think of the Boston Red Sox: the 'Green Monster' [Fenway Park's famed left-field wall]; the devoted fans; and the Sox are known for being unpredictable. And [cut to Harper]: 'Most people think they are racist. And they haven't done a thing to discourage that feeling.'"

In the remaining nine stories, the impact and importance of racism was either not explored or not acknowledged:

One story on urban youth programs mentioned the complaint of coaches that suburban children mistreated their teams. No elaboration was given, and the issue was not pursued. (June 23)

In a playground interview after the championship victory of the Boston Celtics, two black children steadfastly maintained their support for the Houston Rockets, the basketball team that the Celtics had soundly beaten. The reporter, who was white, neither pursued the children's curiously adamant support with his subjects nor explored it with adults (June 9). (Despite the team's distinction of hiring the first black coach in professional basketball (Bill Russell in 1966), there is little support for the Celtics in much of the black community. Local residents say the Celtics' reluctance to showcase black talent— as evidenced by the club's status as the last predominantly white team in professional basketball, and the only one with mostly white starting players—is one reason for the longstanding lack of enthusiasm for the team in the black community.)

Three stories appeared after a June 19 announcement that the math and reading scores of black and Hispanic children in Boston's public schools were below the national average, while the scores of white students exceeded the norm. In a city where minority students are struggling to surmount years of overcrowded school facilities, discriminatory admissions procedures, and stiff and sometimes violent opposition to school desegregation(50), such a news story might be placed in a thought-provoking context by inquiring into the root of the discrepancy of the scores. One story reported without elaboration that the scores were mixed. Another reported that the scores were divided along racial lines, but did not speculate about the causes of the differences. A third news story mentioned "blacks and Hispanics" but went to white education experts for an explanation instead of taking up the matter with representatives of the minority community.

Two stories on the Supreme Court's affirmative action ruling featured reactions from white Bostonians without polling minorities. The need for such a plurality of viewpoints was evident in one story, where the only person interviewed was the president of the Boston Firefighter's Union. He said, "It shouldn't be passed along to me if people were discriminated against for the past 100 years. I don't feel that we necessarily owe anything to anybody in that respect. I don't think that we have to make up for the sins, if you will, of our forefathers. The system is in place and the system works." The interviewer offered neither a rebuttal nor an opposing view (July 2).

In two stories regarding the EEOC ruling in the Tommy Harper case, reporters seemed reluctant to acknowledge the possibility that Harper's charge of racism might be correct. The Boston Herald's story (July 3) was largely a profile of Harper that recounted his pain of being discriminated against as a young baseball player in the 1960s and 1970s. As for present-day racism, the paper did not venture further than this response to Harper's complaint that there are no black managers in professional baseball: "Of course, managing in the big leagues is primarily a white profession, and cronyism being cronyism..."

In a second story, a WCVB reporter (July 2) placed the Harper case in context by recounting the fact that the Red Sox passed up the chance to acquire baseball legend Jackie Robinson because of his race, and that the Red Sox were the last professional baseball team to integrate (in 1959). He rebutted the team's claim of hiring as many minorities as other teams by pointing out that the only black staff member in the Red Sox organization is employed in a minor position. He explained that the team's general manager says he is "well aware" that few black fans go to Fenway Park but is not sure why. Yet instead of suggesting that these conditions support Harper's contention, or at least the perception of racism, the reporter concluded: "The Red Sox may not be racist today, but their management is not making it easy to forget the sins of the past." He went on to suggest measures the team might use to polish its image, including giving away free game tickets to "the underprivileged."

These fifteen items represent news stories whose link with racism was clear-cut. Yet the extent to which reporters portrayed racism as an important social issue was often reminiscent of twenty years ago, when President Johnson's advisory commission found that the media avoided mentioning the issue as a key contributor to the racial violence of the 1960s. Even when stories dealt with social inequity, including clear disparities in education and employment, and black-community disenchantment, most reporters failed to acknowledge racism as an underlying mechanism. When racism was acknowledged, it was portrayed on three occasions as a historical footnote rather than a continuing tradition. Unlike the words "sexism" or "ageism", "racism" seemed to be taboo, rarely uttered in the major media unless a story such as the Tommy Harper case forced the issue—and sometimes not even then. Euphemisms such as "disadvantaged students" (June 11) or "the underpriviledged" (July 2) suggest a fear of insulting minorities as well as a reluctance to acknowledge who or what is causing the "disadvantage." These tendencies reflect the racial composition and, to an extent, the class orientation, of the people who bring Boston its news.

Discussion and Conclusions

In the fall of 1985, WEEI-AM, Boston's all-news radio station, added a new program to its evening lineup of classic radio dramas. The show was "Amos 'n' Andy." It was the same original radio version, created in 1925 and performed by two blackface vaudeville entertainers, that had portrayed blacks as gullible simpletons and made such lines as "I'se regusted" and "Ain't that sumpin'" popular catch-phrases of the 1930s.(51) In 1966, the television version of the program had been cancelled by CBS amid heated protest that it degraded blacks. Twenty years later, the program was on the air again in Boston.

A group of black clergymen, alarmed at what they viewed as tacit endorsement of flagrant and demeaning stereotypes, approached the station with their concerns. Their effort paid off. The station pulled the show, but not before program director Doug Stephan told the Boston Globe that he would discontinue the program "only if they give me good reason to." He added, "We haven't received one word or received one telephone call or letter about [the show] so as far as I'm concerned, this whole thing could be a red herring."(52)

Stephan, who told the Globe he was unaware of the show's controversial history, later said that the station cancelled the program not because it agreed with the ministers, but because it feared losing black listeners. He also said that "Amos 'n' Andy" was more popular "than any other program we were airing. People thought it was funny, entertaining, interesting." When the show was discontinued, the station received "quite a bit" of response from disappointed listeners.(53)

For many black Bostonians, incidents such as this only confirm the view that they are surrounded by a sea of hostility, a situation made more imposing by the insistence of many whites that racism is largely a vestige of the past. Black community leaders say that Boston's racial climate is defined by more than its neighborhoods, its landlords, its politicians, its religious and community leaders, its schools and banks and police force. By propagating information that fails to reflect the true nature of the black community, the local media, too, serve as perpetuators of racism.

The principal complaints are that the local media have a narrow conception of what is newsworthy—a conception rooted on one-dimensional stereotypes—and that events that constitute news in other communities often fail to be recognized by the media when they occur in the black community, and vice-versa. They are complaints rarely reported in the major media, but not ignored by the black press. At a June 11 groundbreaking for elderly and mixed-income housing, Rev. Vincent Dailey was quoted by the Bay State Banner as observing how the new construction would be a welcome psychological lift: "We are tired of having our community slandered in the media for the criminal actions of less than one percent of our residents."(54) And when the advocacy group Black Women for Policy Action gathered in June to prepare a slate of common political objectives, state Rep. Saundra Graham of Cambridge opened the event by reminding the assemblage, "We as black women are tired of the media portraying our images in ways that don't show what we're about."(55) "It's so one-sided," says Melvin Miller, editor and publisher of the Bay State Banner, in reference to media coverage of the black community. "Nobody in their right mind would argue that there isn't a great deal of crime in the black community. But to suggest that crime is all that goes on there is simply not realistic."(56)

Some black leaders believe that the media's presentation of blacks is flawed only because the human beings who decide the news are flawed, and that distorted images end up being broadcast despite the best efforts at evenhandedness. "Their intent is not abusive," offers Melvin Miller of the Banner. "Editors and reports have a certain view of the world, and that controls the stories they select."(57)

Others say that the misrepresentation of blacks occurs too frequently and too consistently for it to be called accidental. Rep. Graham, for example, is one observer who believes that the media "have a definite design in mind to keep black people down. White society does not want to see us for anyone except who they think we are. We're kids having babies, we're running dope, we're homeless, we're out committing crime. Take all the negatives and put them together: that's us."(58) Graham's view is endorsed by Fred Clark, editor and publisher of the Boston Greater News. "Everything negative we do is what the white readership wants to read about us," Clark says. "It's part of an ongoing effort to destroy whatever positive images we have in our community."(59)

As they discuss the shortcomings of Boston's major media, black leaders are unafraid to criticize their own. Some community activists feel that the venerable Bay State Banner, the largest of the three black newspapers, is too middle-of-the-road. With its emphasis on hard news, the Banner is seen by some as the Boston Globe of the black community, a label not intended as entirely complimentary. Similarly, some blacks take issue with the radical flavor of the Boston Greater News, an opinionated collection of local articles and national reports from syndicated black columnists, and the equally outspoken neighborhood monthly, Roxbury Community News.

Community activists reserve their strongest criticism for WILD-AM radio. Critics charge that the station pays little attention to news within the black community, and they suspect the station's fear of alienating a growing number of white suburban listeners. Sadiki Kambon of the Community for Human Rights is one of several black-community representatives to have taken their grievances and suggestions to station owner Kenneth Nash. According to Kambon and others, Nash rejects listener call-in shows, community affairs programs, and other ideas designed to engage the community in a serious discussion of black affairs. "He doesn't want WILD to be perceived as a black station," Kambon says. "He wants it to be seen as a cosmopolitan station."(60) The problem, as Kambon and others see it, is that by not broadcasting more black-oriented news and community affairs programming, WILD loses the opportunity to help counter widespread negative messages about the black community with a more enlightened approach.

Kenneth Nash says that WILD's news "tends to center a bit more [than the major media] on the black community," but says he refuses "to be pigeonholed as an all-black station." Nash acknowledges receiving requests from older listeners for more news (the station targets 18-34 year-olds with its format of rhythm and blues and urban music), and for more community-oriented programs. In response, he cites the difficulty of broadcasting a diverse mix of news, music, and public affairs shows given the station's daytime-only operating hours and the trend in radio broadcasting toward single-format stations. Nash also believes that WILD does an adequate job of covering the black community, given the station's limited news staff. "There's no [black] community news service per se like the UPI wire, and we don't have the ability to send people charging all over the community to cover every little news story. But I believe you'll find that we've covered all the significant news events that have occurred in Boston's black community."(61) (Appendix C lists the news stories that emerged from all four black media outlets during the course of this study.)

The concern that Boston's black activists, community leaders, and media managers voice over news depictions of the black community is supported by sociological studies. Most of the research on the psychological effects of the mass media has ignored minorities and the poor; one 1975 analysis of 2,300 studies on the effects of television found that only 7% contained noteworthy data on these two populations.(62) But the information that is available, much of it regarding television, suggests that the mass media have a significant impact on an individual's self-concept and on his or her conception of others.

The socialization begins early. By the time black children reach late elementary and junior high school, they report that they turn to television expressly to learn how different people behave, talk, look, and dress.(63) Whether the issue is job roles(64), sex roles(65), or overall behavior patterns(66), young black adolescents and teens say they derive a substantial portion of what they know from the mass media, and often more so than whites, perhaps partly because blacks on average watch more television than do whites.(67) Black youths have even reported learning more about black people from television than did their white peers.(68) Clearly the mass media are but one source of information about the world, a source that may not exert as much influence as parents, teachers, or friends. Whether or not the media comprise the primary influences, however, the idea that they play a palpable role in the lives of black youth seems clear.

The media's impact on white children appears to vary depending on the degree of contact the children have with blacks. For example, in a 1977 study involving nearly 1,000 white children, some 40% identified television as their main source of information about black people. But while 68% of the rural children said television was a major source of information about how blacks talk, look, and dress, only 20% of the urban children said so.(69) Other work in the United States and Britain supports the theory that children who cannot compare media images with their own experiences are vulnerable to whatever reality the media portray (a point germane to black children as well).(70)

These findings have direct relevance in a city that has resisted the idea of integrated neighborhoods. Boston features many communities where white residents might have little or no meaningful personal contact with blacks. Over half of Boston's black residents are concentrated in four of the city's sixteen major neighborhoods.(71) Meanwhile, ten neighborhoods are 75% white; six of these are 94%-100% white.(72) The situation is similar in the suburbs. While the number of blacks in the nation's suburbs as a whole has increased modestly from 4% in 1960 to over 6% in 1980, suburban Boston remains nearly 98% white.(73)

Common sense, too, dictates that the messages we hear from people in positions of authority influence how we see others, how others see us, and how we see ourselves. We may not remember the factual details of a news broadcast, but impressions can be unforgettable. It makes sense that if the news reflects the cultural and racial biases, no matter how subtle, of the people who produce it, then those who consume the news will be drawn to internalize those biases.

Syndicated columnist William Raspberry illustrates this point when he notes the contrast between the abundance of gifted Chinese table-tennis players and the scarcity of Chinese who play professional basketball. Raspberry wonders, "Might it be that Chinese youngsters, seeing no one like themselves doing well on the courts, saddled with assumptions that their talents lie in other directions, and embarrassed by their awkwardness the first time they try basketball, simply choose not to compete?"(74) Raspberry's point is that while the expectation of success will encourage black youngsters to undergo endless hours of sacrifice and drill to hone their basketball skills, an avoidance of and eventual failure at other forms of competition—educational, professional, intellectual—is rooted in the expectation that blacks cannot succeed. And when they do fail, the notion is reinforced for both blacks and whites. Blacks have become their images. Stereotypes are reinforced. And a new cycle of racism is perpetuated.

It seems clear that the media play a leading role in this cycle. Any parent or teacher who has watched small children play together amiably, oblivious to their racial differences, knows that racism is not instinctual. It is a learned behavior. At some point in a person's development, stereotypical expectations begin to override the natural, intuitive sense that people are people, regardless of race. Children or adolescents or adults may feel in their hearts that people of all races are inherent equals, but when much of what they hear from parents and friends about a racial group are one-sided, one-dimensional characterizations, they become less sure of their inner convictions. And when they turn to such authoritative sources as newspapers, television, and radio, and see editors, reporters, anchors—people respected for their objectivity—reinforcing the same stereotypes, the conviction dies even more.

What will it take for the major media to represent the black community more fairly? Will it take meetings between the major media and the black media, so that each side can be sensitized to the concerns of the other? In Boston, a forum for such a dialogue already exists. At an annual symposium on ethnic media sponsored by the Jewish Community Relations Council, representatives of the major and minority media meet to discuss press coverage of the city's minority communities. The day-long symposiums offer valuable insights into the willingness of both sides to accomodate each other. For example, at the first symposium in 1985, black editors complained that major media coverage of the black community was selectively negative. The response was that space and time limitations restricted the number of stories that can run in the major media. As an associate editor for the Boston Globe remarked, "If we were to publish all the material that comes into the Globe, we would have to publish an additional 125 pages of solid type each day."(75) The black editors were almost certainly less concerned about the volume of news about the black community than they were about how balanced the news is. Nevertheless, forums such as these serve as important starting points for a dialogue between two camps whose views often diverge.

Will it take initiatives by the major media to study the racism that resides within their organizations? Two years ago, Boston's Gay Community News instituted a racism awareness/affirmative action plan designed to broaden the perspectives from which its news is gathered and reported (Appendix E). Under the plan, the newspaper has established strategies for hiring people of color (including the mailing, with follow-up, of job openings directly to people of color and their organizations) and for setting concrete numerical goals for the coverage of minority affairs, based on the percentage of minority residents in Boston.(76) The results of the present study indicate a pressing need for similar plans at other media outlets. In-house seminars on racism awareness, requests for critiques of news coverage from the black community, and vigorous recruitment and training of black staff members might do much both to improve the quality of local news reports about blacks and to help convince blacks that the major media's commitment to portray the black community with fairness and sensitivity is genuine. When WEEI-AM program director Doug Stephan remarked that he had received no complaints about "Amos 'n' Andy" from the black community, perhaps it was because blacks were skeptical that their protests would be heard.

Will it take the publication of a newspaper that misrepresents the white community in ways that the major media misrepresent the black community? If a paper contained news that reflected one-sided, black-held perceptions of whites, the financial and business section might span 100 pages ("all whites care about is making money"); the sports section might feature weekend athletes nursing overtaxed muscles ("all white athletes are awkward and out of shape"); and the "living" section might profile a yuppie couple who point to their collection of Motown record albums as evidence that they are not racist, while refusing to pay their black housekeeper more than minimum wage because "she would only spend it foolishly" ("all whites are blind to their racism"). Reading news based on such oversimplified views of who white people are and what they do might bring white editors and reporters fresh appreciation for the frustration that the black community feels over news based on equally unrealistic stereotypes of black people. Even more important, it might bring an understanding that all misrepresentation of racial groups springs from similar feelings—fear, distrust, anger—that are rooted in unfamiliarity, and that by increasing the number of minorities on news staffs, especially in key decision making positions, the major media gain people whose familiarity with the minority community makes them less likely to misrepresent it.

By whatever mechanism, it is incumbent on the major media to face this challenge. Every Bostonian, white or black, adult or child, who is touched by the news comes away from the experience a changed person. To the extent that reporters, editors, and producers recognize their role in influencing how the city thinks about race, the media can help dismantle one of Boston's most shameful legacies.

ANTI-RACISM PLAN

Gay Community News Anti-Racism Plan

I. INTRODUCTION

Gay Community News is a national gay/lesbian liberation newsweekly with a commitment to anti-racism, feminism and social change. We attempt to provide a forum for many of the diverse groups that make up the lesbian and gay community. As lesbians and gay men, we understand the alienation, the isolation, and the invisibility which oppression creates. Freedom and human dignity mean that all people take control over their lives including where we live, our education and work, and what we do with our bodies. We understand that any hope of achieving these goals involves fundamental social change. Simply readjusting the hierarchy to include some lesbians and gay men is not sufficient.

Gay Community News exists in a racist world. Although eradicating racism in a society where oppression is institutionalized is an enormous task, as a lesbian and gay institution we take responsibility for identifying, confronting and eradicating racism in our organizational structure, our newspaper, our community and ourselves. As part of our commitment to work against racism, we have developed this anti-racism plan. It includes education of our membership and readership and evaluation and change of our internal processes.

Our goal is to be a multi-racial and anti-racist organization, but we recognize that even as a predominantly white organization we can work against racism. We support the autonomous organizing of lesbians and gay men of color and we support the publications by lesbians and gay men of color. We hope that by using this plan as a starting point, the structure, content, and processes of GCN will change as it begins to function as an anti-racist and multi-racial organization.

II. Goals

Because GCN is a Boston-based organization, most of our volunteers and staffers come from Boston. Therefore, we have set hiring, volunteer outreach, and content goals which attempt to reflect the percentage of people of color in the Boston population. The following percentage goals will be re-evaluated annually to make sure that they are constructive and attainable. The following percentages are minimum goals.

A. By the end of the first year after this plan is implemented, the staff, board and volunteer membership of GCN will be 20 percent people of color. By the end of the second year, they will be 25 percent people of color.

B. 20 percent of the content of the paper, including the cover, news stories, news notes, feature articles, book reviews, calendar, photographs and other graphics, will depict and deal with issues of particular relevance to the third world lesbian and gay community, including anti-racist organizing by lesbians and gay men. 25 percent the second year.

C. 20 percent of the promotional budget will be used to do special outreach to gay people of color. 25 percent the second year.

D. GCN's typesetting business will give preference to third world groups, individuals and publications when accepting new business.

E. GCN will give special consideration to minority owned, as well as gay or woman owned, businesses when purchasing goods and services.

III. Strategies

A. Volunteer Outreach: Because most of the people who work at GCN do so as volunteers, effective recruitment of volunteers who are people of color is crucial to meeting our goals. Other groups and individuals with whom we consulted about affirmative action agreed that personal contacts were the most successful way to recruit both volunteers and paid staffers. Therefore, many of the strategies in this section and the hiring section aim to "plug-in" GCN to networks of gay third world groups and individuals.

1. Members of the anti-racism committee will meet with third world gay and lesbian groups in Boston and, whenever possible, nationally. The purpose of the meetings would be to find out what the perceptions of the groups' members are of GCN and how GCN could better meet the groups' needs. We would also ask people to volunteer at GCN and explain what kinds of volunteer positions are available and how the paper works. We would ask for news or features story leads, calendar listings and other suggestions.
2. Current members and staffers at GCN would be asked to submit names of people of color whom they know who might be interested in working on GCN to the Anti-Racism Committee. They would also be encouraged to contact people themselves if they prefer.
3. Notices would be placed in GCN and other gay media, particularly third world gay media, that we are looking for volunteers who are people of color. The notices would list the kinds of work that GCN volunteers do.
4. Send notices to colleges that GCN is looking for interns, especially third world interns. In addition to sending notices to school employment offices, they would be sent to third world student groups, gay student groups and to teachers and courses which teach skills GCN can use, such as photography, art, journalism or writing courses.

5. Contact gay people of color who work for other gay media and organizations to see if they would be interested in volunteering at GCN.
6. When this anti-racism/affirmative action plan is officially adopted, print an article about it and about the anti-racism committee in GCN.
7. Create a system of volunteer orientation, including a semi-annual meeting for volunteers to talk about their experiences and problems, and a regular agenda item at membership meetings for volunteer issues.

Create a volunteer committee to put together a pamphlet for volunteers about GCN's history and structure, and eventually, to handle training and assessment.
8. Improve the distribution of GCN to third world readers through stores and community groups. Drop complimentary copies of GCN at third world gay groups and neighborhoods.
9. GCN's ad manager will do outreach to minority businesses to encourage them to advertise their services in GCN.
10. The anti-racism committee should immediately revive the minority networking breakfasts at Cafe Calypso. This involves obtaining the mailing list and sending out invitations and contacting the owners of the Cafe.

B. Staff Recruitment
1. Advertising Job Openings: GCN jobs will be announced in the following places:
   a. Ads in GCN.
   b. Ads in other gay and feminist media. The Committee will compile a list of such media.
   c. Ads in publications which reach people of color. The Committee will compile a list of publications.
   d. The anti-racism committee will assist in mailing flyers about jobs to a list it will compile of third world gay groups, gay bookstores and community centers, and individual people of color. Flyers will be followed-up with phone calls. Flyers will include: job description; salary and benefits; affirmative action/anti-racism statement.
   e. Flyers will also be sent to hiring offices, gay groups, third world groups and relevant courses at local colleges.
2. Interviewing and Hiring.
   a. All people of color applying for a position will be interviewed.
   b. All applicants will be asked to fill out an OPTIONAL Affirmative Action Questionnaire which will include questions asking how the applicant found out about the job; whether the applicant is Black, white, latino/latina, Native American, Asian, or other; whether the applicant wishes to be notified about future job openings at GCN if he or she doesn't get this job. Resumes and questionnaires from each job search will be kept on file.
   c. Staff people are asked to give as much notice as possible before they leave. If a person of color is not found to fill the job by the time the staffer leaves, then the hiring committee chooses the next most appropriate candidate. This policy will be re-evaluated after one year. (Alternative proposal which was not passed but may be considered in the future: If a person of color is not found to fill a position by the time a staffer leaves, then GCN hires a temporary person for a specified time up to six months. If a person of color is still not found to fill the position by the end of six months, the hiring committee chooses the next most appropriate candidate.
   d. A member of the anti-racism committee will attend the first meeting of each hiring committee to explain the affirmative action process.),
   e. Hiring committees must give preference to people of color, with the following considerations:
      i. Required Qualifications:
      •Applicants must have some basic skills appropriate to the job, which will be defined by the hiring committee, although GCN is willing to train people for jobs.
      •Familiarity with third world lesbian and gay issues and communities.
      •Commitment to gay liberation and feminism.

      ii. Preferred Qualifications:
      •Connections in third world communities.
      •Activist experience.

      iii. Helpful Qualifications:
      •Knowledge of GCN.
      •Experience working with volunteers.
      •Experience working on a collective.
      •Experience working on a newspaper.
3. Follow-up
   a. The hiring process for each job opening will be documented by the Managing Editor, who will keep on file: list of advertisements; list of flyers sent; resumes received; breakdown of white and third world applicants; who was hired.
   b. Every March, the anti-racism committee will review these documents and make a written report to the membership evaluating our efforts and making suggestions for improvement.
   c. In the absence of a personnel committee, a representative of the anti-racism committee will meet with all newly
